This series of elegant, simple digital prints arises from a process where Lisa Gipton captures the dawn sky. Gipton makes a series of images: she takes one shot of the horizon, then moves her focus to the captured edge of the first image, either vertically or horizontally, and takes another image. When Gipton has at least 16 such images, the real work begins: she layers them all together into one single final work. These layered digital prints veer into abstraction but still retain the soft qualities of natural light. Gipton's work is a collection of slight pauses that layer into an engaging rolling stillness. This is fine work that captures something fleeting and fragile.
